

This evening, Muslims around the world are celebrating the end of Ramadan.

All the talk of political Islam has overlooked the question of what, if anything, Islam says about the environment, and a short blog post can hardly be comprehensive. My initial reading of the Qu'ran reveals something that should be unremarkable to those who have studied environmental rhetoric in the Bible: the text has resources both for those with an environmental conscience and those who think that attention to the environment is misplaced (or even sacrilegious).

Muslim environmentalists will point to the many Quranic passages that state that the signs of Allah's existence and power are demonstrated by nature. (For example, 24: 42-46). There is also the injunction not to disturb Allah's creation, a command that if taken literally would make Deep Ecology look pale by comparison.

Skeptics will point to the overwhelming Qu'ranic telos of the Day of Judgment and Resurrection. This world is not the end, for the Qu'ran: paradise is. It is hard in this context to take the preservation of the planet as an overwhelming value.

Which aspect of the Qu'ran becomes more important for Muslims will, of course, be for Muslims to decide. In the meantime, though, it is edifying to read Ar-Rahman, Sura 55, which the Prophet Muhammed called (rightfully in my view), the "adornment of the Qu'ran".

Despite the occasional sexism typical of ancient texts, its poetic awe at God's creation are moving, both for Muslim and non-Muslim. Here is a website that compares some translations.

We of course wish all our Muslim readers Eid Mubarak.
