

Brian Leiter at Chicago is doing one of his occasional series identifying the top cited legal scholars in a range of substantive areas. One list he has done covers administrative and environmental scholars - however, his list includes a number of top administrative law scholars who do not focus on environmental and energy law. I thought it might be helpful to our readers to have a list that is focused on scholars who work substantially or primarily on environmental and energy law. Unlike Leiter, I've just lumped everyone together without breaking out a separate category for those work only partially in the field—that's because almost all environmental and energy law scholars could be characterized as working in other areas of law, given the interdisciplinary nature of the work. So of course Cass Sunstein is number one. All the caveats that Leiter has indicated about the utility of looking at cite counts apply here. In particular, I also want to emphasize that citations are only a partial and imperfect measure of scholarship, which in turn is only a partial measure of what environmental and energy law professors do. My numbers differ slightly from Leiter's at times because for most of these scholars, I did my own searches. I used the same basic methodology as Leiter, and these are citations from 2010-2014, inclusive. If any readers identify any errors or omissions, please let me know in the comments or by email.
