The Wall Street Journal editorial board claims that California's new cap-and-trade regulations will cost each consumer $3,800 a year and calls it creeping Stalinism. As my UCLA (and UCLAW!) colleague Matt Kahn gently and genially points out, the Journal's editors are engaging in cranial-rectal fusion.

In other news, dog bites man, the sun rises in the east, and the weather is better in California.